During themselves, American settlers gathered in areas to live each other. These areas were denominated settlers and were the basis of shared living areas. Over time, these people have grown in densely populated places called cities, where people, local businesses and government office could dwell, interact and work on each other. During the first 150 years of US history, the number of people living in the cities was relatively small. The beginning of Industrial Amenities eventually leads to an increase in urban life. Nowadays, a growing number of people lives in cities and helps continue the mass employment aspects, entertainment and education. a big cities The three largest cities in the United States are New York, Los Angeles and Chicago. More than 15 million people live in these cities together. These cities are seen as the cream of the culture of US cities when it comes to the abundance of employment opportunities, better educational options and life patterns in general. People are still switching to these cities on the last one. However, the growth rate slowed in favor of other cities in the south and the west, reports the usa today.ã, ã, the small cities are also growing in popularity. A small city It is the home of 50,000 people or less, and they are gaining popularity for a sest of reasons. Between these are the ease of forming personal relationships with neighbors and local employees. People also enjoy a slower pace and a stronger community spirit. Cities in warmer climates, and this helps increase the population of cities such as Las Vegas, NV; Phoenix, AZ; Austin, TX; and Midland, TX. A look at the list of US cities per population growth shows a of the residents of these more temperate climate towns. Is this growth can be attributed to several factors, including technological advances that allow people to work from anywhere, or desire to move away from snow and cold temperatures. The populations of small towns may be growing, but most Americans still live in small towns. Nearly 63 percent of Americans (205 million people) live in embedded places, which include cities, cities, neighborhoods, and villages. According to 2017 census figures, about three-quarters of the 19,500 U.S. incorporated sites have fewer than five,000 people and nearly half of the 1,000-person embedded sites. Technology and Environment A growing number of Americans work connected to the Internet, and if they are remote workers and don't need to be in a certain location, these people can live wherever they want.
